HARRY Daniels

Harry is a celebrated Métis political leader, having influenced various levels of government advocating for the rights of the Métis Nation. Harry had a key role in leading two monumental victories for Métis recognition. His determination and passionate advocacy led to the legal recognition of Métis as Indigenous people in Canada's Constitution Act, 1982. Later, due to his strategic persistence, Harry began the legal battle that led to the Daniels v. Canada victory in 2016. This monumental Supreme Court victory for the Métis finally affirmed that the Canadian government has a duty to respond to the needs of the Métis people.

Harry's accomplishments also include his talented appearance in various productions, authorship of several books, a Master's degree from Carleton University, and his contributions to research on Indigenous rights and justice. Harry's contributions have earned him honorary memberships in numerous Indigenous political organizations.

“We know who we are; we know the generations of discrimination we have endured; we don’t need anybody to tell us who we are”
